

Dear recruiter,

With a Master's degree in software engineering, several years of hands-on experience creating and implementing software applications, and the ability to troubleshoot and solve problems in a timely and accurate manner, I confidently express my interest in the position mentioned in the email. During my first internship with CIC a private IT company in Tunisia, I am involved in numerous large scale software releases and understand the importance of time management and open communication. While balancing athletics and a full academic course load, I have worked part-time with ESPRIT IT department. This role required me to work with all levels of the campus community in order to manage the school technological materials, which has increased my troubleshooting and programming abilities, both of which would transfer well into an internship position. Through these professional work experiences, I've gained proficiency in Java and C++ programming methods along with heavy database. I am also confident in my capabilities to solve bugs and troubleshoot software due to my great math and reasoning aptitude. Additionally, I can tell you that as an athlete I know how instrumental teamwork is to the success of a project. I believe that working alone can only take you so far, while working together will always take you further than you imagine. In fact, my ability to work hard for numerous hours and to endure and maintain a strict routine for months is one of my greatest strengths. My dedication to these pursuits has allowed me to become more patient and stronger mentally, so I am well equipped to handle the long hours associated with coding or training. I believe that the combination of my tenacity, professionalism, academic knowledge and hands-on skill sets will make me an asset to your program. This position would provide me with the ideal opportunity to assist at your organization and to expand my programming skills.
